We believed that children learn best when the materials and activities offered are based on their interests, strengths, needs, and experiences. During play, educators intentionally observe and listen to children to identify meaningful topics to explore further in our programs. Once an interest is identified, educators plan small group experiences and discussions to inspire and extend children's learning. Our physical environments continually adapt to reflect the interests the children are exploring. his cycle of observation, reflection and program planning continues through the ear with no timeline or boundaries.
